

Correct Your Hearing Loss to Prevent Job Loss

Summary: With the uncertainty of today's economy, job loss is a valid concern for everyone. For anyone struggling with a hearing impairment, the purchase of a modern digital hearing aid could preserve their career as well as their ability to hear.

(United States) October 10, 2008 – Today's economy is giving the general population of North America good reason to be concerned. There's so much talk around the stock market plummeting, government bail out plans and the possibility of a new economic depression.

In times like these, employers are faced with tough decisions when they're forced to cut costs. It goes without saying that people will be losing their jobs.

For anyone who has not yet reached retirement age and is living with an untreated hearing loss there's a real possibility that their employment is at stake.

Randy Wohlers, founder of MyHearPod.com says, "With many employers evaluating their staff members to consider who will stay and who will go in a round of job cuts, anyone with an untreated hearing loss could be among the first on the chopping block. If you're trying to hide a hearing loss, you are probably not doing as good a job as you think. Your inability to hear is probably evident in interactions with customers, co-workers and your overall job performance."

If you were your employer, what would you do? And how would you feel after the fact if you knew that getting a hearing test and consequently, a hearing aid, could have saved you your job?

A hearing impairment can affect every area of your life. One of the biggest problems faced by people who can't hear but don't purchase hearing aids is the ability to make good decisions and that can also mean rough patches on the work front.

People dealing with hearing loss automatically say yes if they didn't hear a question. This is to spare themselves the embarrassment of asking for a question to be repeated over and over. This can be disastrous in business if you're constantly agreeing to do one thing, but were actually asked to do another.

Nobody wants to be faced with losing their job, but right now that's going to be the case for thousands of people. You should do everything you can to prevent that from happening.
